"It was a great experience! Advanced Cognitive Coaching Training provided an opportunity to delve into and reflect on my beliefs and values as both an instructor and a cognitive coach. I am now better able to mediate the thinking of others, because my skills are sharper and my understanding of the power of cognitive coaching is deeper. Learning is a constant part of my life's journey, so continuing down the path of cognitive coaching training ensures that I can "walk the talk". "

Group Coaching

Thursday, August 2, 2012

Prerequisite: Cognitive Coaching Seminars® Foundation Training

Cognitive CoachingSM was developed as a means to support individuals. As knowledge of that process developed, questions arose about how the same knowledge, skills and tools might be applied with groups and organizations. Given the shortage of time in schools, it makes sense to think about group and organizational applications of coaching.

This academy will consider how group coaching differs from facilitation and individual coaching. Core group coaching capabilities will be described as a framework for thinking about how small group coaching skills build on individual coaching skills. Applications and possibilities for the impact of group coaching will be explored. Principles and practices for using Cognitive CoachingSM as a tool for developing collaborative groups will be presented.
